After dinner, I had much conversation with Soames, the Minister of Agriculture, about his Common Market problems. He thinks the agricultural interests in the UK can be satisfied. When the other guests [redacted] left, we sat up until one o'clock with us Nancy and Teddy White, who are about to leave for a trip on the continent.

Earlier in the day, Andy Lynch came to see me. He has resigned from the Foreign Service, but would like to remain active in some other occupation.

Elmer Staats, his wife and son, called on me this morning. He is on his way to Vienna, on behalf of the Treasury, to conduct a survey of our Balance of Payments situation.

Mr. R. G. Wysor and his wife visited me. He has been in the steel business for forty years or more, but is now partially retired. He once managed the Bethelehem Steel Sparrows Point works in Baltimore, where I first met him.

The members of the US tennis team who have been playing at Wimbledon called on me this morning. I went off for an early lunch, then attended the matches at Wimbledon. With other diplomats, we had been invited to sit in the Royal Box, and [redacted] to be there before the Queen's arrival at 2:00 p.m.

There were some spirited matches. The Australian, Laver, who may make a clean sweep of all championships this year, duplicating Budges' feat, was in superb form, romping easily over his compatriot, Mulligan. One of the American girls who [redacted] ~~came~~ to see me this morning, Mrs. Susman, was a star in doubles. But the most exciting match was that between the Yugoslavs and the Australian team, Fraser and Emerson, in brilliant men's doubles. The Yugoslavs won. So inexorable is the tea hour in England that at 4:42 the Queen and her suite left for their daily cups. The weather was fine, and the spectacle at Wimbledon the finest of tennis that could be found anywhere.
